English Translation:

'My cousin^[1],

My council of State has informed me that it would be advisable for Sir Stanford^[2], our resident here, who is a born subject of the Roman Catholic Church^[3], to be recalled by yourself so as to avoid certain inconveniences that might occur to him in the present state of affairs. I wish, on my part, to prevent the consequences of a matter which, I know, cannot in any way concern him personally. I find myself obliged to let you know by this letter, so that you may give orders as you see fit. However, I must confess with all honesty to the aforementioned resident, that I request this only for reasons of state, and not out of any personal dissatisfaction I may have taken against him.

My cousin, I remain with the sincerest friendship your affectionate cousin,

[Whitehall, June 20th 1679]

Charles R[ex]

1. In 1679, King Charles II was on the throne, and it would make sense given the tone, language, and content of this letter for the French 'cousin' to be his first cousin, Louis XIV of France, with whom he entered into the Treaty of Dover the following year (in which Charles promised military and diplomatic aid to France in exchange for his public conversion to Catholicism). King Louis XIV of France would have had the power to grant sanctuary to a person non grata, such as the mentioned Sir Stanford.
2. Sir Stanford seems to be an English Knight, seemingly born a Roman Catholic, who must be relocated for his own safety. The king is eager to emphasise that he has no personal quarrel with Sir Stanford, but wants to avoid an incident.
3. After the Reformation, being Roman Catholic in England was problematic. However, the king's sympathies towards this knight shed light on his own Catholic inclinations. These manifested throughout his reign in a number of ways, but most strikingly in his own conversion to Catholicism on his deathbed in 1685.
